AMA REITERATES CALL ON COAG TO ADOPT WA MODEL OF MANDATORY REPORTING

The AMA – at Federal and State and Territory level – is reiterating its call on the COAG Health Council to adopt the WA model of mandatory reporting provisions for doctors seeking treatment for mental health and stress-related conditions.

AMA President, Dr Michael Gannon, said today that the next meeting of the COAG Health Council is critical for mandatory reporting policy.

“The next meeting is a rare opportunity to finally fix the legislation that for too long has stopped doctors seeking the help they need,” Dr Gannon said.

“The entire AMA is unequivocal in its support for what is needed, and the medical profession has waited a long time for this opportunity.

“It is now up to Ministers to deliver on behalf of patients, doctors, and the other regulated professions.

“If they only tinker at the edges – or attempt to reword the existing model – they will only reinforce the existing barriers that are blocking doctors from seeking support.

“We urge Ministers to avoid an alternative proposal, which is based on the current Queensland model. It does not work.

“The principle underpinning the WA model – an exemption from reporting for impairment – has been proven to work.

“The WA model does not pose a risk to patients. There is evidence that it does help doctors.”

Dr Gannon said that doctors deserve the right to access health services, just like their patients.

“Doctors and other health workers are at greater risk of mental illness and stress-related problems, yet the current laws inhibit many from seeking treatment for a mental health condition because they fear for their medical registration,” Dr Gannon said.

“The mandatory reporting laws have a twofold effect – some people will not seek help at all, and those who do may not divulge all the necessary information to receive appropriate care.

“The AMA is extremely concerned that we have a situation now where doctors may be avoiding necessary health care, putting both themselves and their patients at risk.

“We know this. Doctors have told us. We have lost too many colleagues and friends to the scourge of mental illness. The figures compel us to act.

“The AMA’s view is clear. We need a model that addresses the issues currently stopping doctors from seeking the treatment they need. We need a model that we know for certain will work, while still protecting patients. We need a model that can be adopted nationally.

“The AMA believes the current model in WA is the right one. It is a proven model. It has given doctors the confidence to seek the help they need and there is no evidence that it has diminished patient safety in any way.

“It is also a model that was recommended in the Independent Review of the National Registration and Accreditation Scheme, a Senate report, and a number of academic studies.

“It in no way stops the medical profession’s ethical and professional responsibilities to report a practitioner who may be placing the public at risk.

“Delegates at the AMA National Conference in May were unanimous in seeking amendments to the National Law, so as to not dissuade medical practitioners from seeking necessary medical treatment of assistance.

“Options that simply reword the current legislation, or seek to maintain the status quo, will do nothing but condemn doctors to continue to suffer in silence.

“Now is the opportunity to address the problem once and for all – because healthy doctors are best placed to help their patients. Anything less puts both doctors and patients at risk.”

Background

- Data from the Australian National Coronial Information System shows that doctors and other health workers have the highest suicide rate among Australia’s white-collar workforce. Between 1 January 2011 and 31 December 2014, 153 health professionals died as a result of suicide.
- An extensive study of more than 12,000 doctors by Beyondblue in 2013 revealed that 34.3 per cent cited concerns about their medical registration as a barrier to seeking treatment for a mental health condition.
- The Western Australian Parliament accepted the medical profession’s arguments, and the Western Australian National Law contains an explicit exemption from mandatory reporting for treating doctors.
- Australian Health Practitioner Regulation Agency (AHPRA) annual report figures show that mandatory notifications have risen in Western Australia since the exemption came into effect – from 12 in 2011/12 to 37 in 2015/16.
